

The South in the Building of the Nation, Vol. 6 (Classic Reprint)

Excerpt from The South in the Building of the Nation, Vol. 6 Economically as well as politically the South was prostrate when her armies surrendered in 1865. For the next ten years, or during the Reconstruction period, the conditions which existed prevented or hindered normal recovery from the effects of war. Before the war the South was a distinct economic region with problems and conditions unlike those of the free states. This condition was generally considered one of the results of slavery, but the abolition of the slave-labor system failed to change radically the economic peculiarities of the South. In 1865 industrial society scarcely existed in the South. The great loss of life and health by the whites in the war, the destruction of the slave-labor system, the suffering and destitution which existed during the last years of the war and for several years after the surrender, the destruction of property during the war, the loss of capital, the bankruptcy of the state and local governments all these unfavorable conditions bore heavily upon the desolated country. Public property was, for the most part destroyed or confiscated because it had been used by the Confederate government.
