

All We Had In Common: A Memoir

The older came from wealth, the younger from poverty. Two women coming at life from seemingly opposite directions, their unlikely friendship made even more unlikely by the inherent nature of their familial connection. All We had in Common, Suzan Mitchells autobiographical account of her often-strained relationship with her mother-in-law, is a poignant, sensitive examination of what it is that truly binds us together. In caring for Dodi in her last days, often alone, Suzan experiences humanity on its simplest terms, the veneers of time and place and status stripped away to reveal not the differences, but the similarities. The revelation is transforming, for both women, leaving Suzan grieving over a loss that's ultimately overpowered by a much deeper and more timeless truth.
