

A Womans Work Is Never Done: A History of Housework in the British Isles 1650-1950

The majority of women throughout history have spent their lives doing housework. No other occupation employs half the population or makes such an immediate impact on peoples way of life. Yet the history of housework has been virtually ignored. Caroline Davidsons pioneering book is a study of domestic life in Britain, the first country in the world to experience the effects of rapid urban and industrial growth. She discusses the development of the three utilities affecting domestic life - water, gas and electricity. She then describes in detail the most important household tasks that women did between 1650 and 1950: cooking, heating, lighting, cleaning and laundry. Further chapters are devoted to domestic servants, the time women spent on housework and the amount of help they received from their families and, finally, womens attitudes to their chief occupation. The author has drawn on an extraordinarily wide variety of sources, provides extensive bibliographical notes and includes over a hundred illustrations, most of which have never been reproduced before. A Womans Work is Never Done provides a stimulating and entertaining account of the housewives changing (and unchanging) status, as well as a unique insight into three centuries of life in the British Isles.
